Luckily, I came across a rather intriguing article online:

"Roman remains discovered in Exeter city centre"

With a find so close to home, I could not resist and arrived at Mary Arches Street in Exeter only a few hours later.

Who would have thought that there were such prolific remains just beneath it?

I read an exciting article in a renowned British newspaper:

"Little Pompeii";

Roman ruins discovered under site earmarked for French housing estate"

I packed my backpack and set out for Vienne, a town in the South of France without delay.

I discovered the most exquisite mosaics there.

After I'd found an article in an Italian newspaper:

"Mini Pompeii found in Rome during metro line excavations"

I went there and made an interesting find at the Aurelian Wall in Rome!

Coordinates: N41.873501°, E12.501514°

Notes:

The location in question is 710.22 km away from this Mini Pompeii, as the crow flies.

There is a distance of 336.06 km between the location in question and Little Pompeii.

There are 928.14 km between the location in question and the Roman remains discovered in Exeter.

Here's a clue:
draw radii on a map!

What's the name of that place again?

Lara has been to several European digsites this year. She has been on her feet so much, in fact, that now she got a little confused and has forgotten the name of a small town she visited last year. She managed to recollect the distances between the location in question and three of the digsites she visited this year. Can you help her find the location of the digsite that has slipped her mind?

Ah,
thanks to a little thought-provoking impulse,
I now remember the article that lead me to the location in question, it was published 17 November 2016:

"Puzzling Roman-Era Remains Found in Switzerland"

As it turns out, there was a camp of the Roman legion in what is now the Brugg District in the Canton of Aargau.

The exact location in question was Windisch Königsfelden, postal code 5210.
